

Contributors

Jo Barraket is Professor and Director of the Centre for Social Impact at Swinburne University of Technology. Her research interests include the third sector, social enterprise, and the relationship between governments and civil society in new public governance.

Graham Cuskelly is Professor and Dean (Research) for the Griffith Business School. His research interests are volunteer management practices, sport governance and the development of community sport. He has been a chief investigator on several ARC Linkage grants, published extensively in international journals, and co-authored books on volunteers in sport and sport governance.

Kirsten Holmes is an Associate Professor in the School of Marketing at Curtin University. She has nearly 15 years' experience of researching volunteerism and has published in leading journals including Nonprofit and Voluntary Sector Quarterly and Voluntas. She is a member of the research committees for both Volunteering Australia and Volunteering Western Australia.

Russell Hoye is Professor and the Director of the Centre for Sport and Social Impact at La Trobe University. He is the editor of the Sport Management Series produced by Routledge, a member of the editorial board for Sport Management Review and the International Journal of Sport Policy and Politics.

Pam Kappelides is a member of the Centre for Sport and Social Impact at La Trobe University. She has extensive experience in volunteer management and her most recent publication and website is Be Prepared: Sport and Active Recreation Programs for People with a Disability: A Resource Kit for Volunteers and Staff commissioned by Sport and Recreation Victoria.

Robyn Keast is Professor in the Southern Cross University Business School and Chair of its Collaborative Research Network: Policy and Planning for Regional Sustainability. Robyn has a diverse research portfolio covering social and physical infrastructures, with a particular interest in networked arrangements and collaborative practice.

Marc Levy is a Director of Right Lane, a consulting firm that helps organisations, particularly not-for-profits, to develop and implement better strategies. Marc holds two business degrees and a PhD from the

CONTRIBUTORS

University of Melbourne. His PhD thesis was titled: 'Volunteering for income support: relative benefits and policy implications'.

Annette Maher has had an extensive career working in the not-for-profit sector in both volunteer and paid positions, including Volunteering Australia and Volunteering Victoria. She is currently undertaking a PhD study on the history of Volunteering Australia and its impact on volunteering in Australia through Flinders University.

Myles McGregor-Lowndes OAM is a Professor and Director of the QUT Australian Centre of Philanthropy and Nonprofit Studies. He is a founding member of the ATO Charities Consultative Committee and the Australian Charities and Not-for-Profits Commission Advisory Board.

Melissa Moore has a PhD from Victoria University. She joined the John Richards Initiative at La Trobe University in April 2013, where she is currently assisting in research dedicated to improving the wellbeing and sustainability of older aged populations in rural communities.

Cameron Newton is an Associate Professor in the School of Management at the Queensland University of Technology. He teaches quantitative research methods and organisational psychology to undergraduate and postgraduate students. Cameron's research interests include organisational culture, occupational stress, biofeedback using heart rate variability, and volunteers.

Wendy O'Brien is an interdisciplinary sociologist working within the Griffith Business School. Her research interests include volunteers in sport, women's wellbeing and communities of practice in higher education. She has presented papers at international conferences and published research papers and book chapters in these areas.

Lisel O'Dwyer is a social scientist at Flinders University and has spent two decades working on a range of issues which all address social justice and wellbeing. She is a strong proponent of mixed methods research designs and uses many of her professional skills in her own volunteer work.

Maryam Omari is an Associate Professor at the School of Business at Edith Cowan University in Western Australia. She has been working and researching in the areas of human resource management, cross cultural management, quality of work-life Issues, and management of inappropriate behaviours at work for over 20 years.

Melanie Oppenheimer holds the Chair of History at Flinders University. She has been researching aspects of volunteering from an historical and contemporary perspective for over 25 years. Her books include the centenary history of Australian Red Cross. Melanie chairs one of the four Working Parties associated with the new SA Volunteering Strategy, 2014-2020.

CONTRIBUTORS

Megan Paull is Director of Postgraduate Research in the School of Management and Governance at Murdoch University, Western Australia. Megan has worked with Volunteering Western Australia to conduct research and run workshops on volunteer management since the early 1990s. Her particular focus has often been on managing difficult situations.

Jeni Warburton holds the John Richards Chair in Rural Aged Care Research at La Trobe University in Wodonga, Victoria. She has 25 years' experience of research into social policy, particularly relating to issues associated with an ageing population, volunteering and community. Her research has played a key role in the development of practice and policy around volunteering and social inclusion, particularly relating to older people.

Rachel Winterton is a research fellow with the John Richards Initiative at La Trobe University, Wodonga. Her program of research investigates the influence of rurality on healthy ageing, with a specific focus on social and civic participation among diverse groups of rural older people.